

HILARY DUFF TAKES CHARGE

'80s ROCKER

ON HILARY:
Tunic, Tysa; jeans,
her own; bracelet,
Lee Angel; pumps,
Ashley Dearborn.

There has been lots of speculation about her new image, but our guest editor-in-chief explains why—despite the tabloid rumors—she's still role-model material.

These days, when people talk about Hilary Duff, it's often to debate whether she's "gone Hollywood." After all, the fresh-faced girl who played Lizzie McGuire is just as well-known for glamming up her image and dating Joel Madden—an older, edgier rock star—as she is for her music, movies, and clothing line. But as Hilary explains it, these changes are more about growing up than selling out. She remains focused on projects that both she and her fans feel good about, whether they're her movies with a message (like Material Girls, in theaters now) or signature products, like her new fragrance, With Love . . . Hilary Duff. She told Seventeen that even though she looks different, she is still a good girl—and that is exactly the kind of girl she wants to be. ➡
